thus been polluted by the burial of a heretic. The grave is the third from the corridor—but I doubt if any bones are in it, for the soldiers could not watch forever.

The church of Our Lady of the Angels is the prettiest structure in the city, with its Doric facade, massive square towers, turrets of bronze and roof of green zinc; and its legends are dear to the heart of the Cartagoans. The clusterings of rich foliage out of which it emerges, and the volcanic boulders piled around it, serve to heighten the effect of the alabaster-bued pilasters that flank the doorway, and the cohort of angels—all of boyish stature, winged, petticoated and buskined—which are caged behind an iron network in a series of niches on the east side of the main entrance. The high altar of this church is one of the finest I have ever seen. Above it, rising to a height of thirty feet, is a lofty tabernacle of cedar, lavishly gilded and divided into chambers, the lower one containing the Sacrament and the upper an image of Our Lady of the Angels. The architraves projecting from these chambers are supported by golden cherubim figures three feet high. From the dome of the tabernacle ascends a golden image of the Angel Gabriel, bearing in his right hand a silver sword and in his left

A PAIR OF GOLDEN SCALES.

The pillars and cross beams of the sanctuary, in the centre of which this superb altar stands, are painted in arabesques and during the month of May are hung with a profusion of lace and network of pale blue. The church is kept wonderfully clean, and always fragrant with frankincense and fresh flowers. Near the door is a large box wherein the people deposit their offerings to the sacred image. At the end of every six months the box is opened and poor as the people are the accumulated tribute seldom falls short of $1,000.

The story of our lady is as follows: In the year 1613 a forest stood close by the old City of Cartago. At its edge lived an old woman, who, coming out one morning to gather firewood, found the image of a lady lying on a stone near her own hut. The image was of stone, and very heavy; but she dragged it to her room, and having set it up in a corner, returned to the forest. As she raised the same stone a second time, she was astonished to find upon it what she supposed to be another image precisely like the first. This, also, she dragged to her hut, when she discovered that the one she had first placed there was gone. Returning a third time to the forest, there upon the same stone was a third image, exactly like the first two; and running to the hut, beheld, no image was there. Alarmed she went to the curate and told her story. This devoted prelate, Don Alonso de Castro de Sandoval—had the image brought to his palace and securely LOCKED IN A PRIVATE CLOSET, intending to examine it as his leisure. But when he returned to the closet, it was empty; for the image had miraculously gone back the fourth time, to the stone near the poor woman's hut.

That settled all doubts of the supernatural origin, and in solemn procession the people conducted it to the Parochial church and set it up amid masses and music, prostrating themselves before it. But the very next day, when the curate went to pay a visit to the wonderful Zody, her shrine was vacant—and she was again found on her stone at the edge of the forest. Then this church was erected upon the chosen spot, and therein the willful image has ever since remained. In 1782, the illustrious Estaban Lorezo de Trestan, bishop of Nicaragua, christened her "Our Lady of the Angels," and declared her to be the especial patroness of Cartago. The illustrious Don Augustus de Santa Cruz presented the splendid jewels that to-day adorn her tunic; and another bishop consecrated her with holy oil, forbidding the image to be thenceforth touched by any but anointed hands. Last of all, the church in which she still remains was consecrated by the illustrious Don Anselmo Lorente, and raised to the rank of a Basilica.

Strange to relate when every other building in the vicinity was shaken to dust by Iran's wrath, the church of Cartago's patroness remained unharmed.

AMONG THE MANY MIRACLES which she is believed to have wrought, one of the most remarkable was the routing of 800 buccaniers. It seems that the enterprising rascals, under command of Captain Manfield (one of Morgan's fellow-pirates), had landed at Matina and penetrated as far inland as Tarraha, committing all manner of depredations on the ways. The Sergeant-Major of Cartago, realizing that none but "heroic measures" would avail, marched boldly forth to meet the plunderers, with only a picket of men, but carrying Our Lady of the Angels at the fore.

Descending into the valley, at the foot of White Tower volcano, where the buccaniers were encamped, their unexpected appearance so frightened the latter, who perhaps mistook the stone lady for some dreadful regime of warfare that they took to their heels, and subsequently to their ships with all possible speed. And to this day the anniversary of the miracle is celebrated in Cartago.
